

Blue Ribbon Extension Communication Award
Southern Region of the American Society for Horticultural Sciences

Background: The Blue Ribbon Extension Publication Award was initiated in 1987. The Southern Region has been recognizing research publications for years, and the award was established to give those authors of extension publications recognition among their peers and administrators. Initial publications recognized were circulars, bulletins, tabloids, manuals, newspaper series and fact sheets. Recently, the award has been expanded to include video, computer programs, and other methods of delivery, and was renamed the Blue Ribbon Extension Communication Award. Communications are evaluated for audience, purpose, organization, content, reading quality, and writing quality, with each area rated from poor to excellent. Communications must receive a certain minimum score to be designated as a Blue Ribbon Award. On average, 50% of the publications receive a Blue Ribbon, but this varies from year to year.
